quiry to Rhodesia, the stage is set for a new round of decision-making the end of which cannot now be foreseen. Lord Alport does not sound the least encouraging. According to him most white Rhodesians want a negotiated settlement which would be sensible and honourable. At the same time he feels sure that a large number of Europeans in Rhodesia do not want a settlement and would be prepared "to see it to the bitter end". The two statements are contradictory as they were probably intended to be.
