

Weekly Notes

Aid in One Packet

THE aid climate has improved. The Consortium has pledged $ 1028 mn for the fourth year of the Plan. Of this amount, US has offered $435 mn, other member countries $348 mn and the World Bank/IDA the remaining $245 mn. The total amount pledged is roughly the same as last year, but there are some marked differences. The entire requirements of the year have been met at one meeting instead of being given grudgingly in instalments as was done last year. The terms are easier and about one-half of the aid is not tied to projects. The US has contributed more than the other member countries and, besides, the Congress has authorised a fresh contribution of $ 312 mn to IDA, thereby enabling it to continue in business and to help India which is its largest borrower.

It will take time for the credits to become operative. But the amount pledged and the more sympathetic atmosphere in which it has been pledged are assuring. They reflect appreciation of the efforts that have been made at this end to recast policies and to improve the export performance. The donors have been gratified by what is described as the Government's more pragmatic approach to problems of pricing of essential commodities, the rationalisation of import and licensing procedures which is in hand and, not the least, the opening of the doors a little wider to private foreign capital. Which goes to show that the T T K Budget has been received more favourably abroad than at home.

A far reaching liberalisation of imports is, nevertheless, still ruled out. The servicing liabilities which fall due this year are larger than last year's and there is no assurance that the buoyancy in exports will continue.

Why Are Shares Depressed ?

A Correspondent writes:

WHILE it is perfectly true that economic growth in the country is not linked to the gyrations of the stock market, it cannot be denied that business confidence is very much affected by its behaviour. The present state of the exchange is causing concern in more than one quarter; from small brokers who may have to close shop if the market does not pick up to the Finance Minister who is convinced that "bears are hammering down the market", there is a general worry that unless something is done the business world is likely to face a crisis in October or November.

Yet so far the market has defied analysis; the causes attributed by old hands vary from the Finance Minister's indictment that it is part of a gigantic manipulation by big business, to the belief of stock exchange officials that the margins are too high and controls are too vigorous for adequate free play in the market. The trouble with both these hypotheses is that they fail to explain why investors are keeping away from the market. As excessive concern with the behaviour of speculators is the kind of dangerous mistake that old hands from the Finance Minister to stock exchange pundits are more than liable to make.

That speculators are manipulating the market does not seem to make sense; manipulation is a glib expression used by those who disapprove of the exchange to explain any behaviour that they do not understand. Why should bears manipulate at this stage? The normal reasons are to force the investor to sell out so that they can make a killing by cheap purchases. The way the usual bear manipulation takes place is as follows: Suppose a bear wishes to buy a particular stock in large quantities he opens the market by a sale thus depressing that stock, at the same time hoping that a series of investors and small speculators will follow his lead, then as soon as the stock is sufficiently depressed, he cuts the market by purchasing at lower levels. The essential point in the manoeuvre is that others must follow him so that he is able to purchase at lower levels. Now suppose—as is the case today—the investor makes no move at all, he neither sells nor buys; the bear is left stranded and the manipulation is a total failure.

The fact is that a speculator is only successful when there are investors in the market. The base of any market is not the speculator but the investor, the speculator can operate only when the market is moving. When TTK therefore complains of manipulation by bears he is assuming that investors are in the market, but the assumption just does not seem to hold. One of the best indicators that the investor is not in the market is that most new issues are taken up almost entirely by the underwriters. Companies with excellent reputations have found that the market has absorbed less than 20 per cent while the underwriters have been forced to take up over 70 per cent of the stock. The root cause of the market depression therefore seems to be the unwillingness of the investor to enter the corporate sector.

Real Estate: the Magnet

TO those who remember the bears of 1960 this is the startling feature. One explanation that is offered is the non-availability of money in the hands of the investing public but this explanation could be considered plausible if all other markets were equally depressed, and that is obviously not the case. Money continues to chase goods, urban property goes skyrocketing, and the inflationary pressure on the economy is unabated. Would we, therefore, be right in making the much more startling and very serious proposition that investors do have money but that they are switching away from the corporate and therefore the industrial sector of the country?

Prima facie at least a whole series of events seems to bear out this theory. One phenomenon is particularly relevant in Bombay: the spectacular real estate boom that is on at the moment is obviously taking away a part of the investment that should come to the corporate and industrial sector; in some cases land prices have doubled themselves within one year and a steady 30 per cent appreciation has become a natural phenomenon over the last two years. Ownership flats are also sharing in this boom; two and three bedroom flats in the smarter areas of Bombay are quoted at 70 and 80 rupees per square foot and some of the new houses are being offered on a freehold basis at as much as Rs. 100 per square foot! The Finance Minister's differential tax on capital gains on urban property has done nothing to restrain the overwhelming pressures on land prices as most landowners have merely switched from selling to leasing at spectacular rates. The Government of Maharashtra itself has joined in this gay venture; land which it leased at Rs 600 per offered to the public at a minimum of Rs 1,600 and the last agreement was concluded at Rs 2,600 per square yard. That individuals, corporations, and institutions are willing and able to pay those prices clearly indicates not a shortage of money, but an excess of it.

Nor is the profitability of industries contrary to this phenomenon. Most industries are set up in the corporate sector. As the corporate tax is 50 per cent, the investor looking to his net return would want the corporate sector to earn at least twice as much before investing. Today the money market is so tight that it is comparatively easy to obtain a rate of 7 to 9 per cent for just depositing money with good reliable parties for short-term. Therefore to give an equivalent return a company would have to earn at least 20 per cent of its market value as reflected by share prices. Most stocks yield between 4 to 9 per cent on current prices and this is acceptable so long as there is hope of capital appreciation. But the present state of the market certainly indicates a dullness which leaves no hope of appreciation. Old investors are reluctant to pull out as they would prefer to wait and see. New investors, however, are not prepared to go in as they are able to use their capital better elsewhere.

The real estate business is very much a case in point. Here not only is there a steady net return which varies from 12 to 20 per cent but the appreciation is so high that it more than compensates for any possible fall in the return.

It would be rash, however, to suggest at this stage a remedy to the present flight of capital. More analysis is required before arriving at any conclusion. Obviously, however, if there is any truth in this belief, the cure would have to be in two directions; first, reducing the profitability of other markets and second, increasing the profitability of stocks and shares. It is high time the Finance Minister turned his thought in these directions instead of admonishing the stock exchange to mend its wicked ways.

A Troubled Era Begins

Romesh Thapar writes :

EVEN as Delhi bid farewell to Jawaharlal Nehru in a gigantic demonstration of affection, the battle of the succession had been joined. Gulzarilal Nanda, as senior-most member of the Union Cabinet, had been summoned by President Radhakrishnan to lead what amounted to a caretaker government and he proceeded to project himself as someone who was likely to stay as Prime Minister. Morarji Desai lost no time in announcing his candidature; he is aware that any decision "at the top" will go against him, and, therefore, he urges a secret election by the party's parliamentary group. Lai Bahadur Shastri and his influential supporters among the organisation men desire a quick, unanimous decision, which will prevent Nanda from using his present position to entrench himself. On the surface, it appears that these are the only contenders.

However, the widespread fear among these leaders that their squabbles will throw up some lesser known element as the compromise candidate, now that there is no one of any meaningful stature left, creates certain pressures around President Radhakrishnan who is being urged to intervene decisively in selecting the man who will head the new government. The President is known to favour Lal Bahadur, but he is terribly inhibited about exercising his powers in a situation which might release unfortunate, pent-up political passions.

Something of these political passions can be gauged from what little is already known of the tensions which exist. Nanda's bitter hostility has made of Morarji Desai a determined campaigner. Jagjivan Ram, commanding some 60 parliamentary votes, is believed to have made his compact with Morarji Desai. This combination is not prepared to accept the theory that the Chief Ministers who are now in Delhi should decide between themselves as to who enjoys overwhelming support, because it is argued that a secret ballot among their supposed satraps in Parliament would reveal a startling splintered condition in the representation of each State. Lai Bahadur opposes this method on the plea that it puts a premium on political corruption, but actually he knows that his best chance is in forming an alliance of Chief Ministers behind him with Kamaraj as a totem of north-south unity.

Nanda is not so politically weak as some try to make him out to be. He enjoys the support of a majority of the Cabinet, and of a number of Nehruist Chief Ministers who will probably join forces with Indira Gandhi. Of course, the image he projects is not inspiring. But, then, who does inspire? Nanda obviously needs time to consolidate his position. And it is precisely time which his opponents wish to deny him.

In this complex balance of power, when alignments are highly opportunistic and change from day to day, it

FIRST TO GET THE

CERTIFICATION MARK

Alind was among the first few industrial establishments in the country to apply for a licence under the ISI certification Mark Scheme... and the very first to get it!

Bare aluminium conductors produced at Kundara bear this mark  while those made at Hiraakud bear . Now, Alind's covered (insulated) aluminium conductors too carry certification marks  for ALIND AL-VINYL and  for ALIND KER-AL-LITE!

ALIND where quality first is an article of faith!

THE ALUMINIUM INDUSTRIES LIMITED

India's largest manufacturers of aluminium conductors and accessories.

Registered Office:
Kundara (Kerala)
